We interpret the facilitation of sound-responsive neurons to increased coherence between LFPs recorded from a region of left or right auditory cortex in our device as reflecting enhanced sensory processing of sensory stimuli. For one, increased sensory processing is reflected in the improved measures of sound responsivity (Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"}). In particular, we find that increases in sound responsivity correlate with increases in sound-responsive neurons (Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"}). Furthermore, our results show that noise is a superior cue than coherence, and that the task specificity of this effect is unconfounded with increased LFP coherence. Thus, noise results in a facilitation of sound-responsive activity that is independent of coherence. In contrast, increases in coherence between the two electrodes in a pair of probes does not cause a facilitation of sound-responsive activity (Fig. 4{ref-type="fig"}). This explains why the rate of sound-responsive units does not show a significant correlation between coherence and responsivity. Another way to understand the differences between noise and coherence is that noise increases the spatial spread of the recording electrodes, in comparison to coherence (Fig. 2{ref-type="fig"}). As the electrodes are closer together, the spread of the recording LFP in the two electrodes increases, and the contribution
